Windpower: Nebraskas' Great Energy Resource

Wind Power History

Using the power of the wind to produce electricity is not a new concept for Nebraskans. Before the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) strung the state with electric lines and connected the Midwest into a nationwide electric grid, many farmers and others had small electric generators hooked up to their windmills. They used this electricity along with a system of batteries to store power when the wind wasn't blowing, to run their radios, a few lights and other small electric appliances. Our grandparents knew that winds in Nebraska blew often and hard, and they took advantage of the fact.

The Midwest has been called "the Saudi Arabia of wind energy". North Dakota alone could supply approximately 45% of the current U.S. demand for electricity. Here in Nebraska, according to the Union of Concerned Scientist's report, "Powering Nebraska: Renewable Energy for the Economy and the Environment", Nebraska wind energy could produce 120 times the electrical demand for the state. This is only if all of the windy areas of Nebraska are used to generate wind-powered electricity. Wind power is generally divided into six classes, class six being the highest wind speeds and best potential, class one being the worst. Nebraska wind energy could generate 27 times the electricity currently used by just developing the class four, five and six wind sites.

In the late 1970s into the early 80s, wind power generated a lot of interest, and due to the interest started generating electricity as well. Much of this interest was fueled by tax incentives for investments into renewable energy, which had been created by the Carter administration in reaction to the price shocks created by the OPEC oil embargo.

It was determined that U.S. energy policy should attempt to make the country energy self-sufficient. The tax incentives that were created through this debate caused a flurry of investment into wind turbines. Many small under-financed companies went into operation and began producing units. On the generation side there was not much interest in windpower on the part of the utilities. It was private entrepreneurs, through a federal mandate that utilities buy back power from independent producers, that started many of the nation's wind farms. When the tax incentives ended many small under-financed firms when bankrupt. This caused the wind energy industry to receive a bad reputation as unreliable. People could not get replacement parts for broken turbines. Many of these small firms were manufacturing turbines that should not have even been on the market.

The bright side of all of this is that the firms who kept their head above water have emerged stronger for it. Due to the bad reputation windpower had gotten, the industry has constantly been improving itself. The reliability of the turbines increased, while the price per kilowatt kept dropping. Wind power is now cost competitive with most conventional means of producing electricity, averaging about 4-6 cents a kilowatt. The current year round average for Lincoln customers is 5.7 cents a kilowatt, slightly lower in winter and higher in summer, according to Lincoln Electric System (LES).

Most of the wind farms in this country and also in the world are in California. Califomia has over 16,000 turbines in operation, which are generating over 1600 megawatts, enough electricity to power a city the size of San Francisco. This isn't because California has the best wind resources (Nebraska has over 14 times the potential that exists in Califomia). California's wind farms have more to do with politics than the geography or wind speeds that exist in the state. Wind classification are determined by looking at two variables, the strength of the winds (how hard they blow) and the availability of the wind (how often it blows). During the governorship of Jerry Brown, California embarked on a bold path towards a sustainable future, by making a sizable investment into renewable energy resources, not only into windpower but also into solar power.

Economic Development

The economic benefits of an investment into a wind farm are not limited to the farmer upon whose land the plant is sited. For the farmer whose land is selected for a wind farm site, the turbines would only take up 5% or less of the land area, which means the farmer could still farm or graze livestock right up to the base of each tower. This integration of a wind farm with the existing use for the land can mean an increase of income of between $30 to $140 per acre per year, increasing the farmer's return on high land anywhere from 30 to 100 percent depending on the land use and the fertility of the soil. In addition to this direct income to farmers, an investment in windpower would have an added economic benefit to the rural economy. First there would be the temporary jobs during the construction phase, as well as a number of permanent jobs in the maintenance and running of the plant. Finally there would be an increase in economic activity brought about by the use of local existing businesses to supply component parts.

Nebraska Conservation Council is a non-profit, non-partisan organization working to further the goals of the SEED Campaign. Since Nebraska Conservation Council is supported by its own members, we urge larger contributions whenever possible.

Since NCC lobbies to influence legislation affecting all Nebraskans, contributions are not deductible.
